

But isn't religion harmless?

Christianity is a religion and religion is essentially harmless, BUT Christianity is also a dogmatic belief system which is always harmful for a society. Although many Christians only treat select claims as truth, the claims related to what they are seeking truth on, they still support belief in taking all of the Bible's claims as the inerrant inspired word of a god.

But doesn't it inspire good?

Christianity only gives bad reasons to do good where good reasons are actually available. Reasons that are not exclusive to or dependent on Christianity and do not carry the negative baggage of a dogmatic belief system. Santa inspires kids to do good but eventually they must move on and find better reasons to do good. It is time we move on from Christianity too.

2 THINGS EVERY MORAL PERSON MUST KNOW ABOUT CHRISTIANITY

1 The Bible is NOT inerrant

2 Making it socially acceptable to believe it is inerrant makes it socially acceptable to...

attack marriage equality, attack freedom of choice, attack medical research, attack public education, murder children through reliance in faith healing, murder in God's name, censor the public, discriminate, and much much more.

Why Christianity is a dogma.

Christianity is the following of Jesus Christ's teachings in accordance with the Bible/scripture. Christianity rests upon the tradition that the Bible is the inspired inerrant word of God told through prophets for it makes claims that, if were true, could not have been known to man independently. If the Bible is not taken as inerrant and God inspired then Christianity is meaningless for there would be no way to tell what parts are suppose to be true and what parts are not. No outside non-religious sources support the claims that are crucial to the faith such as heaven, hell, souls, sin or Jesus dying for our sins.

Can you have Christianity without the Bible? No.

Jesus Christ, along with his teachings, is based upon the religious texts of Christianity. Although most historians believe a regular human figure dubbed "Historical Jesus" inspired some of the Gospel stories on the figure Jesus Christ we still know nothing about this potential historical figure and especially do not know any of his possible teachings.

Can't we just agree to disagree?

Agreeing to disagree is ONLY an option for beliefs, NOT CLAIMS.

The Bible makes claims which people base personal decisions upon, decisions that affect the freedom & well-being of others.

- Votes & elections are based on these claims
- Laws are based on these claims
- Medical treatments are based on these claims
- Women's rights are based on these claims
- Opinions of others are based on these claims
- What children are taught about history and science is based on these claims

Bad people will do bad things...

But what does it take for good people to do bad things? The answer: convincing them that counterfactual claims are inerrant. Those who do harm in the name of Christianity are not twisting the words of the Bible to fuel hate. They are good people doing what is morally right based on the belief in the inerrancy of the Bible's claims. A belief that we need to stop making socially acceptable.

Examples of such Bible claims...

The Bible claims Hell, Heaven, and souls exist and that homosexuality is a sin. All major campaigns against marriage equality in the USA base their motives on those claims, to protect people from Hell by discouraging a sin. The Bible also claims that prayer will cure all injuries or illnesses. Many children die because their parents rely on prayer instead of seeing a doctor. In all of the Bible's examples of faith healing there is no need for a doctor and such parents are convinced their children ARE being healed as the Bible promises, even after it is too late.
